After 16 months of active duty, Don O'Steen, a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve, spent 10 months in Iraq working with the provincial reconstruction team there to build schools, public health infrastructure and facilitate economic development in the Babil region near the ancient city of Babylon.

"It's been a sweet homecoming," said O'Steen, 57, who returned to work at the O'Steen finance office where he was staying, although not in his last mission before retirement. But hazards were still there.

"They still have a lot of challenges. It's a still fragile situation," he said.

O'Steen, who came home unhurt, said he was "lucky." By the time he was deployed, the insurgency had lost its steam. But hazards were still there, he said. A rocket was fired into the embassy office where he was staying, although no one was hurt, he said.

O'Steen has many stories from his recent tour in Iraq, but the one he likes to tell is how he witnessed glimpses of Iraqis' resilience to years of bloodshed and their unyielding desire for freedom.

One of these moments came this past Fourth of July, he said.

"What struck me is that they have a keen sense of what it is to have freedom and liberty. These are people who lived under a crushing dictatorship," O'Steen said. "We had local Iraqi staff who worked with us carrying out different tasks. They do these things day in and day out even though a lot of them have been targeted and told they would be killed if they work for the Americans. That's an unbelievable amount of courage for someone who is not a soldier and just trying to take care of his family."

O'Steen described Iraqi people as "well educated and ambitious people with a strong sense of national identity" — an aspect, which he said gives one hope for the country's future.

Still, he said Iraq — being rebuilt after years of neglect under Saddam Hussein's brutal dictatorship — has a long way to go.

Because of the dominance of oil, other sectors of the economy are still weak. For example, O'Steen said local growers in the Babil province, where he served, were undersold because of cheaper, better produce coming in from Iran.

"They still have a lot of challenges. It's a still fragile situation," he said.

O'Steen said the significance of the mission he helped facilitate was marked by some $16 billion spent on the Babil region alone to improve its political and social infrastructure, setting up new market places, working with a rehabilitation hospital that makes prosthetics and a non-governmental operation (NGO) that donates wheelchairs and building a courthouse.

All his hard work didn't go unrecognized.

O'Steen was awarded the Bronze Star for completing his duty, which the Army described in the narrative as "one of the most challenging company commands in theater."

Meanwhile, O'Steen intends to stay in the Army Reserve for another three years, although he hopes the recent tour will be his last mission before retirement. But it is possible he can get called back by his country to serve once more, he said.
